

From Left to Right,” was founded in 2003 by political journalist Chris Nolan, who “decided to stop yelling at her TV set and started writing and publishing political commentary.” Nolan describes her work as “stand alone journalism,” referring to the work of experienced writers and reporters who use inexpensive Internet publishing tools to convey information. In an April 4, 2007, post entitled, “Election 2008: Grrrrl Power,” Nolan declares that “housecleaning is in order.” Visit <http://www.spot-on.com/> for witty, feminist election commentary.

Call for Teaching Notes for Feminist Teacher

Do you have a teaching moment that you would like to share with Feminist Teacher readers? We would like to invite readers to submit brief descriptions of classroom experiences that challenged or encouraged your commitment to feminist pedagogy. Did a teaching strategy work especially well? Was a class particularly discouraging? In your teaching note, describe the experience and tell us how it shaped your approach to teaching. We also invite submissions that describe class materials (books, articles, films, etc.) that worked particularly well. Please explain the context in which you used the material and how you taught the work. If you have teaching experiences or teaching materials that you think Feminist Teacher readers would appreciate, please consider submitting them.

We encourage teachers from all kinds of classrooms and institutions to submit their experiences. Please keep your teaching notes between 500 and 1000 words. Send an electronic copy to feminist-teacher@uwec.edu with subject line “Teaching Notes” and a hard copy to:
